Chris was educated at St. Martin's School of Art where he studied illustration and fabric design. After graduating he worked in advertising and as a freelance illustrator working mainly for educational publications.

He began etching about fifteen year's ago after attending a printmaking course at Suffolk College. As an illustrator the majority of his work is figurative and now as a contrast he tends to explore landscape and architecture in his prints.

When he was a student he was encouraged to keep a sketchbook and he finds this a rewarding habit producing many of his prints from sketches.

Drypoint is a simple and direct form of intaglio printing. The technique involves scoring lines into a clear plastic plate. Traditionally copper plate is used but polycarbonate plastic is cheaper, readily available and has the advantage of being transparent so a drawn image can be placed under the plate and worked on directly. Tone can be added by scoring the plate with sand paper.
